Strategies to Support Teachers Working with Central Australian Indigenous Students

Central Australian Indigenous students come from diverse backgrounds. These strategies have been effectively used in the past to help Indigenous students feel comfortable in the school environment. However they may not be appropriate for all Indigenous students. This research is designed to assist educators to observe what is appropriate for their particular situation. Educators must use their professional discretion to decide what strategies to utilise, with the well being of the students being of primary concern.

Classroom Management and Behaviour Support Strategies

- Create a comfortable classroom environment with a relaxed atmosphere
- Find a balance between good classroom management and flexibility
- Use open style questioning
- Develop empathy with your students and your own personal style of operating
- Be flexible in accepting different ways of students' working
- Organise things so all students experience success (eg: scaffolding activities)
- Provide clear programs and good resources to help students feel that they are regarded as serious learners; be prepared to have extra supplies of basic resources and materials at hand

Greetings, Farewells, Name-calling

There are no specific terms for 'good morning' and 'hello' in Central Australian languages. A greeting in Arrente would be:

'What's up? Werte'	'I'm just here for no particular reason. Ware'
'Are you well? Unte Mwarre?'	'yes, I'm well. Ya Yenge Mwarre'

Many groups acknowledge people they are passing by calling out the name of their skin group, or the relationship term like 'brother' (kakey). In some cases it is preferable to ask a third party what someone's name is. If you ask the person directly they may feel ashamed and may not answer. People do not use personal names very often instead they use the appropriate kin relationship term such as brother or auntie. It is important not to refer to the names of people who have passed away or to someone's death. They become Kwemantyaye or change their name.

When people are leaving they usually announce; 'That's all. We are going home now.' 'Kel. Anwantherr apmer- warl alheyel.' It is also polite for the host to explicitly tell people when to leave. 'That's all because we are tired.' 'Kel, awantherr alhengkerr-ketyew.' By listening carefully to how people communicate it is possible to learn how to help Indigenous students feel comfortable.

Show respect for the individual student in your attitude and behaviour

- Don't put undue stress and pressure on the students by talking or criticising them loudly or angrily in front of others
- Don't use heavy-handed discipline
- Avoid anything that can be interpreted as singling out students, such as deliberately calling them out of a group or praising individuals. Instead praise a group of students. 'That group of young fellas are working well.'
- Make time and effort to work at problems on an individual basis
- Have a combination of techniques that allow you to respond to student needs with flexibility
- Recognise that boys and girls may have different learning styles
- Allow the element of choice in set work where possible

Strategies to Support Teachers Working with Central Australian Indigenous Students Pedagogy

Indigenous Learning Styles	Non-Indigenous Learning Styles
Collaborative / small group work	Individual
Ecological / shared responsibility	Consumer / accumulation of success
Observation, listening and imitation	Verbal Instruction and verbalizing
Holistic (global) learning (Putting together)	Analytic, verbal (step by step)
Reflective from observation	Practice / learn through mistakes.
Repetition	Scientific Inquiry learning
Spiritual/ connection between past/present/future	Rational / Secular
Visual/ spatial	Theoretical
Contextual (real life context)	Decontextualised
Spontaneous learning	Structured learning
Concrete learning (present experience)	Abstract (symbols)
Real life situations	Practice in contrived situations
Indirect questions no answer required	Direct Questions
Consensual/ group decision	Confliction /debate
Relationship orientated	Time orientated

'Education will only be successful when it values culture and traditions and when teaching is adapted to the cultural learning styles.' (Hughes 2004 p. 249)

Practical Ideas for Learning Activities

- Effective teaching methodology can be developed through strong teacher-pupil relationships
- Design practical learning experiences
- Reduce competition
- Sequence activities and provide a clear structure
- Discussion of one idea at a time
- Include lots of review, repetition and drill activities
- Relate class work to real life and work place needs
- Take time to demonstrate or give visual cues as you talk, and only talk for brief periods at a time; gather students around you if possible
- Take care to present eye catching worksheets, that allow students places decorate or personalise and capitalise on visual skills
- Try and get students out of the classroom regularly
- Make homework optional
- Lack of motivation is superficial good teaching that provides a clear focus and well defined frameworks will spark students interest in doing well
- Consider alternative ways of presenting material not just chalk and talk
- Allow students to teach you about their knowledge (bush foods, family kinship relationships)
- Relate things back to the students own experiences as a starting point for learning
- Make the school system explicit

Christie and Harris are two Northern Territory educational writers who studied communication patterns in Arnhem Land. Christie claims that traditional Indigenous children expect to learn by being present at school and by going up through the year levels they do not necessarily have to achieve satisfactory results. In traditional culture learning occurs by participation in the daily affairs of the family and participation in rituals not necessarily through assessment. Communication can break down at school because of contrasting notions of knowledge and how it is acquired. (Christie, M. 1987 p.46-51)

Language in Central Australia - Strategies to Improve Communication

- Speak slowly and maintain normal intonation patterns
- Do not speak louder unless someone has hearing loss
- Complex sentences in English and vernacular languages do not follow the same rules. Use short simple sentences. Don't break a sentence to put in extra information. 'When Julie Brown comes (remember she's the lady who sent that fax) we'll have a meeting.'
- Give one point at a time. Thinking aloud is difficult for ESL students such as 'I wonder if the drought has broken? When will we go to the'
- Avoid figures of speech: e.g. 'Give me a hand. You're a pain in the neck. Get off my back. You're holding me up. The baby has just dropped off. They will walk all over you. You blew it this time.'
- Use standard Australian English (SAE) not Aboriginal English. Keep instructions clear and brief. Use the same repetitive instructions such as, "Sit down!" This is particularly important for young children who may not understand a sentence like 'Would you please sit down?'
- Reinforce oral language by modelling repeated requests and asking the student to repeat what you have said. If a students says 'Toilet?' Model the question: 'Can I go to the toilet?'
- Do not code mix using Aboriginal English and SAE in the same sentence
- Meaning can be made clear through actions, hand signals, visuals and talking about past events
- Provide time for silence and responses. Indigenous people may take longer to respond to a question than non-Indigenous people
- Some words may not be understood because a certain way of speaking may not be used very much in Indigenous languages. 'I need' is often interpreted as 'I want' and 'if' is interpreted as 'when'. 'If I go to town I will take you.' can be misunderstood as, 'When I go to town I will take you.'
- When people say 'yes' it doesn't necessarily mean they have understood agreeing to what you have said. It is rude in Indigenous communication to disagree with someone so they may agree to what you say but have no ownership of that decision. This form of gratuitous concurrence is often practiced in non-western communication patterns
- Interpreters may need to explain in greater detail what is being communicated as concepts may need to be explored
- Polite language. There are no equivalents of please and thank you

Body Language

Indigenous people observe body language carefully. It is polite to also observe how other people are arranged when coming into a situation where people are gathered. It is fine to ask where to sit. If a group of people is sitting on the ground it is appropriate to sit down with them if they want you to join in on the discussion. It may be a good idea to ask, 'Where is the appropriate place to sit?' 'It is rude to stand with hands on hips and talk at people. We should learn what shows respect.' (Downing, in Walsh p.107)

- Accept the sexes dividing into groups
- Speak to students at an adult level and make it clear that their opinion is valued
- Work with students' autonomy
- Realise that there is a 'silent' language used amongst Indigenous students
- Be aware of what may be going on in the family or wider community situation

Commands

At a remote school, commands are often ignored the first few times as Indigenous children do not generally act on the first command of their elders at home. Usually after the command has been given a few times the children respond. It is important that teachers set up a routine and standard of student behaviour that is to be maintained early in developing a relationship with their class. Teachers can be spared some disillusionment if they are able to understand why the students react to requests and demands in the manner that is culturally appropriate for them.

Group Focus

- Let students work in groups to gain confidence
- Make reading aloud to the class optional; respect older students preference to read as a group or in a group
- Work with the Indigenous peer support system eg: allow students to work with someone who helps them, or a partner; set group projects
- Accept that standards will be set within the group, especially by the more outgoing students, rather than by the teacher
- Try and harness the leadership potential of key students who influence other group members

Remember that the personal relationship between teachers and students is critical:

- Develop mutual respect between students and students and teachers
- Have high expectations, but don't be unrealistic
- Don't give up on students
- Adolescent Indigenous students relate best to mentors and teachers of their own sex
